French road police stand at attention to salute a column of "Tommies" on their way to the firing line. These military police enforce traffic rules with the same efficiency and disconcerting lack of the personal equation found in the biggest New York traffic "boss." Pict. Press.

A remarkable aeroplane photograph of ammunition dumps, hangars and storage buildings serving a section of the front. A picture that gives a vivid idea of the immensity of the organization and preparation behind the man in the trench. Pict. Press.

French 105 m.m. guns being moved to new positions. The gasolene motor has made possible the use of these batteries of immense guns in much the same way the lighter field pieces are handled. They are shifted from point to point of attack with a quickness and ease that are astonishing. Pict. Press.

French machine gunners have taken up a position in a shell hole commanding a wide section of German trenches. It's these little squads of machine gunners that give so much trouble to attacking parties. One such gun can hold up hundreds of charging troops. Pict. Press.
