OF THE UNITED STATES.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, April 6, 1802.

[Debate on Berceau—Concluded.]

Mr. Dana moved to amend the reſolution by requiring a ſtatement of the ſums paid to the officers and men of the Berceau, together with all papers relating thereto.

Mr. Giles.—The gentleman from Connecticut ſays, the precedent in the caſe of the Britiſh treaty does not apply, as the reſolution then paſſed related to the negociation and not to the execution of the treaty; but the fact is that reſolution did relate to the execution of a treaty, as the treaty was already finally negociated. Mr. G. ſaid he had introduced this obſervation to ſhew that there was no analogy whatever between the paſſage of that reſolution, or an agreement to this reſolution as ſubmitted by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Griſwold.) But that reſolution was preciſely like this, as propoſed to be altered, with one reſervation; in the former caſe it was propoſed that the Preſident ſhould withhold all ſuch information as he ſhould think improper to communicate, whereas in the preſent caſe there is no ſuch reſervation. Yet the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Griſwold) as appeared from the Yeas and Nays, was in the former inſtance againſt the call.—The fact is, notwithſtanding the remarks of that gentleman, there was nothing in the reſolution agreed to by the Houſe in the caſe of the Britiſh Treaty that involved the claim of the Houſe to participate in the treaty-making power. We now conform the preſent reſolution to that then offered, except that we do not reſerve, as we did then, the right to the Preſident to withhold a part of the papers; that is we give to gentlemen all and even more, than they then denied us. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Griſwold) on that occaſion made a handſome ſpeech to ſhew that we did not poſſeſs a conſtitutional right to call for papers; but he now tells you, that you have not only the right to call for papers, but you have the additional right to call on the executive for his purpoſes. Mr. Giles begged leave to know whether this change of conduct evidenced that reſpect for the executive department which gentlemen had heretofore ſo often profeſſed. He alſo begged leave to compare the ſpirit of thoſe gentlemen with whom he then acted, with the ſpirit of other gentlemen now, and to aſk whether the ſpirit then manifeſted was not a ſpirit of forbearance, and one which gentlemen on this occaſion altogether diſregarded. Thoſe who then voted for papers, have ſince uniformly voted for papers, and now vote for them.

The gentleman has ſpoken of the accommodation of the French officers of the Berceau. The fact is, that the officers and men were in the firſt inſtance placed upon the ſame footing; both were allowed two dollars a week. On this ſum it was found the officers could not ſubſiſt. Application was made to the executive that the officers taken ſhould receive a larger allowance, on the ground that France ſhould pay the ſums allowed. Mr. Giles would aſk whether there was ground for crimination here? Whether it was improper to reſpect the law of nations, and to treat the French officers, as officers, under ſimilar circumſtances, were always treated? And yet this conduct of the executive, which while it manifeſted a reſpect to the law of nations, alſo evidenced an equal regard to economy, had excited a great clamor. Mr. Giles concluded by expreſſing a hope that the gentlemen would get all the information poſſeſſed by the executive, from which they will find that the moſt ſcrupulous regard had been paid by the executive to the laws, and particularly to thoſe that reſpected the expenditure of public money.

Mr. Dana ſaid he begged to obſerve that he had not ſaid that any part of the executive conduct in this affair was wrong. If the ſtatement made by the gentleman from Virginia was correct, he would not heſitate to call what he had heard a popular clamor, and would do all in his power to put it down.

Mr. Randolph read a document, in the poſſeſſion of the Houſe, to ſhew that the information, deſired by Mr. Dana, reſpecting the ſums paid to the officers and men of the Berceau, was already before Congreſs.

Mr. Dana withdrew his motion.

Mr. Nicholson renewed it.

Mr. Griswold ſaid he had voted againſt the call for papers under the Britiſh treaty. He ſhould vote for this call. He had before ſtated, and he repeated it, that the ground on which that call was made, was that the Houſe had a right to participate in the treaty-making power.

The volume of the debates which then took place will ſhew that both parties conſidered the call in that light. We then ſaid, if it is your object to impeach executive officers, or to know how much money has been expended, you have a right to the papers; but when you avow your object to be an interference with the conſtitutional powers of other departments, we refuſe them; ſo alſo ſaid the Preſident. But in this caſe we only call for papers in relation to the ſale, purchaſe, and repairs of the Berceau. And have we not a right to enquire into the expenditure of public money? No one has ever doubted this right. Mr. Griſwold ſaid he would for theſe reaſons vote for the preſent call, believing that his vote on this occaſion would be perfectly conſiſtent with that under the Britiſh treaty.

Mr. Giles ſaid he denied that the Houſe of Repreſentatives in 1796, claimed a participation in the treaty-making power.

They contended for the right, a right which he truſted they would never abandon, of obtaining information whenever they were called upon to carry a treaty into operation. The firſt reſolution of the houſe, adopted on that occaſion, expreſsly diſavows the right to participate in the making of treaties.

[Mr. Giles quoted the journals to this effect.]

Mr. Griswold ſaid he was aſtoniſhed at the gentleman having read a reſolution that altogether defeated his own argument.

[Mr. Griſwold here read the journal.]

The queſtion was then taken by Yeas Nays, and the reſolution carried by a unanimous vote.
