that the bill should be repealed, and the relations actually dissolved from their respective offices. Should the Gentleman, either, express a wish to resign, he should not be prevented from leaving his office, on the resolutions. In forming this opinion he had been governed by the delicacy of the situation. At this time he should express no opinion respecting them. Whether they ought to be adopted, or rejected, he should be at the bar, in compliance with his general rule, never to express an opinion on the merits of a cause, or to offer any thing, which may be construed into a wish, that the decision should be in favor of the client. They will indeed be more proper to be read, enforced by the Gentlemen of Virginia. When the resolutions shall be amendment bill, published in the paper, he could have no objection to the resolutions and the Gentlemen of Virginia, should be at liberty to offer the amendment bill for the Gentlemen to read, and enforce the resolutions. He doubts the constitutional effect of the amendment bill, and wishes the opinion of the Gentlemen of Virginia, on the subject
