

Thos. Broughton, his daughter-in-law Henrietta Charlotte De Lisle, wife of his son Nath. 1st; Nath. 2d son of Nath. 1st; his daughter Constantia, who married John Gibbs, and Charlotte Izard, daughter of Nath. 1st. There are no photographs extant of the Ravenel portraits. Mulberry Castle was built in 1714 by Gov. Thos. Broughton. It was a reproduction of one of the family seats in England, and was not, as some suppose, erected as a defense against Indians, though the neighbors did, during the Indian war, congregate there, as it was the strongest place in the vicinity, and most capable of a successful defense. Upon the death of my great-grandfather, Thos. Broughton, what remained of the Mulberry grant was divided between his two sons, Thomas and Philip Porcher. P. P., the younger, settled South Mulberry, and built the house in 1808. I have no knowledge as to whom the Ravenel portraits, or those of Gov. Johnson and his wife were painted by. In one corner of Gov. Johnson's portrait is the legend, 'Healy's 61, April 7, 1705.' In the other the coat of arms with crest, and beneath them the motto, 'Loyalty, not interest.' The pictures of Gov. Broughton, his daughter and daughter-in-law bear the legend, 'Henrietta Johnson Fecit, South Carolina Ano., 1720.' I omitted to say, in immediate connection with the Ravenels, that I own, and use daily at dinner, a silver mug, holding over one pint, which belonged to Daniel and Elizabeth, and has on the handle the initials 'D. E. R.'"
