

West, and for some time engaged in school-teaching. When the rush to California was at its height, in 1849, he was at St. Josephs, Mo., with a stock of goods adapted to the necessities of those who went overland to the mines, and there another Hayden schoolmaster (No. 335) "entered his store to add to his outfit, and they recognized each other as schoolmates in the little schoolhouse at Haydens. When "border ruffianism" interrupted trade there, he packed his goods to Santa Fe, and later found his way to Tucson, Arizona. There the Rebellion found him, and his loyalty made him eligible to the post of probate judge, to which the general government appointed him during the war and so long as he chose to hold the office. He ran supply trains for the government, and on one occasion, during Indian disturbances, he was attacked by a large body of Indians. He made a barricade of his wagon train, which he arranged in a circle forming a corral for horses and men, where they defended themselves two days, with the loss of two men, when the Indians retired. On another occasion his train was stopped by a robber band of Indians, whose chief had become a terror to those who had occasion to cross the plains. But anticipating the probability of such an attack, Mr. Hayden had in reserve a force sufficient to defeat the Indians, their chief being among the killed, greatly to the relief of those who had occasion to cross the uninhabited portions of the territory. Several years since he went into the rich valley of Maricopa County, where he established the Hayden mills, naming the place Hayden's Ferry, now Tempe. He is now president of the board of education of the territorial normal school at that place, and when the present national administration came into power, it was rumored that he was likely to be made governor of Arizona Territory.

433. Charles Benham Hayden, Smithfield, Isle of Wight Co., Va. (Norman^{1st}, Ebenezer^{1st}, Ebenezer^{2nd}, Ebenezer^{1st}, Daniel², William¹); born at New Haven, Conn., Jan. 21, 1817; died at Smithfield, Va., Jan. 28, 1883; married (1), Aug. 12, 1840, Louisiana S. Cocks; she died July, 1843; married (2), April 21, 1844, Mary Elizabeth Kilby; she died Dec. 27, 1861; married (3), Nov. 11, 1867, widow of Jas. D. Wilson.