Scope and Content Note

The papers of John Wallace Carroll (1906-) span the years 1941-circa 1989, with the bulk of material dating from 1941 to 1953. The collection documents Carroll's role in developing and implementing American psychological warfare operations during World War II, first as director of the London office of the United States Office of War Information and later as deputy director for European operations, and subsequently through his work for the Psychological Strategy Board, the State Department, and the United State Army from 1947 to 1952. The papers also contain material pertaining to Franco-American relations during World War II and research files on disaffection toward Joseph Stalin's regime in 1941. The papers have been maintained in subject groupings and numbered folders created by Carroll. Each topical grouping is accompanied by narrative histories and inventories of files written by him.

Carroll's work for the Office of War Information (OWI) is documented through memoranda, correspondence, reports, and a large collection of propaganda leaflets. The papers contain relatively little material from Carroll's year and a half as director of the OWI's London office. Notable exceptions include a report on the office's activities written for a Senate committee in August 1943, directives for American leaflet operations in May 1943, and an analysis of German defeatism by anthropologist Ruth Benedict in December 1943.

The bulk of OWI material concerns Carroll's duties as deputy director for European operations in Washington, D.C. An extensive day file consisting of memoranda and correspondence reflects the broad range of psychological warfare operations directed at Europe from January 1944 to July 1945. Also featured is a substantial compilation of propaganda leaflets written in French, German, Italian, Dutch, Spanish, Czech, and Polish, among other languages, accompanied by translations and memoranda.

After the war, Carroll served as a consultant for the Army, the State Department, and the Psychological Strategy Board. The collection includes speeches and reports presented by Carroll on development and use of psychological warfare during the early years of the Cold War.

The collection contains drafts and research material for "It Takes a Russian to Beat a Russian," an article written by Carroll for Life magazine in 1949 exploring Germany's failure to exploit anti-Stalin disaffection during the German invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941. Carroll based his article in part on information provided by Ernest Koestring, a German military attaché in Moscow before the war, and Hans von Herwarth, an official in Germany's Foreign Ministry. The collection contains a lengthy memorandum written by Koestring and Herwarth as well as their answers to Carroll's follow-up questions. Also included are briefings on and translations of German psychological warfare documents aimed at the Soviet Union. Letters and documents received by Carroll from Soviet and Ukrainian exiles who read his article are also included.

Franco-American relations during World War II are documented through copies of letters written by Harold R. Stark, commander of United States naval forces in Europe and liaison to exiled French forces in London. The letters were originally appended to a report written by Stark's aide, T. B. Kittredge. Also included is a report written by William L.

Langer titled "Our Vichy Policy and North African Venture." The report, commissioned by Cordell Hull, served as the basis for Langer's Our Vichy Gamble, published in 1947.
