RULES OF THE GAME.

The party must be provided with counters.

There are several ways of playing, viz.

First. The party should consist of sixteen.* Draw lots, or otherwise agree who shall commence, and in what order the rest shall follow; then let the first person read the opening division of the Game, (comprising A and B) without spelling, and the rest follow in succession, each reading one division of the Game, only, and with the utmost rapidity.—Every Blunder loses one to the Pool.—When the last division of the Game is read, let the person who commenced change place with the one who concluded, and all the rest shift places too, that they who read the shorter divisions, may now read the longer ones; that done, let the party run through the whole again, and he who has made no blunder wins all the counters in the poll; while blunders must pay the forfeits usual in such cases.

Second. Two, three, or many (even sixteen persons) may read together, and each must read the whole Game, as follows:—Let the second commence when the first has pronounced the first word; the third and the rest follow successively, in the same manner, taking care to imitate a laugh when they come to ha! ha! ha! and to pronounce cılık пилку, and other such words, in as droll a way as possible: This is merely to excite mirth, and the only forfeit is, for giving over before the whole is read.

Note.—Rapidity of utterance, and gesticulation are essential.

The hard words, (constituting the humour), are here collected, and may be learned prior to playing the game.

* Two persons may play, if they read a division alternately.
