

Broadway must look to its honors, for Forty-second Street is running it a close second as the Great White Way. A new night photograph of the Public Library—a picture it was impossible to have taken at this time last year. You remember the lightless nights, of course. Publishers Photo Service

Looking out across Lake Worth from the roof of the Club House at Palm Beach. The Florida winter resort season is now in full swing and society is taking up again the gay life which characterized this popular wintering place in pre-war days. Underwood & Underwood

Plenty of work still to be done by the Sanitary Corps of the Allied armies. When the Germans withdrew from occupied France they left practically all the wells polluted. These British Tommies are scientifically sterilizing and purifying the water supply of this little French hamlet. Gillians Service

Reconstruction is the order of the day everywhere in France. The soldier's work being over, this British Tommy finds food for thought in watching a French farmer cultivating his field in preparation for planting a winter wheat crop. Gillians Service

How would you like to have to swing a gigantic door like this every time you took your flivver out of the garage? When the Yanks took over this Zep hangar at Trier, Germany, they found safely stowed away inside over a hundred Hun airplanes. Gillians Service

Not the nests of a flock of bank swallows, nor the ancient ruins of a Mexican colony of cliff dwellers, but the individual shell shelters of our own Yanks along a roadside in the Argonne. Is it any wonder the boys are glad to be back? American Photo Service
