

A hospital has been founded in Paris to treat the canine-wounded in the war—both the official Red Cross dogs, the messengers, and the less official mascots. Here is a little fellow blinded in the battle of the Somme, yet every inch a hero.

A sturdy fox terrier which has been wounded in the leg is shown here receiving as expert attention as that allotted to any Tommy, and deservedly.

Dogs of War

Photos, International Film Service.

A regimental mascot who led a fine free life on the Aisne until he charged a grenade with a time fuse. He doesn't remember just what happened next.

This was a Red Cross dog doing duty in the Vosges until he was badly wounded by shrapnel. Now he is just able to drag himself out into the sunshine.

A hero of Verdun. After a year and a half at that death-front he has been sent to the hospital for a rest, after which he will return to duty.

The Rock Hotel, at Saitama, near Tokio, which is being carved out of the solid rock-face by a Japanese farmer. He plans it to have three stories and a hundred rooms, an undertaking which may take two generations.

A New Departure in Hotels

Exclusive photos, J. Dumas.

The builder at work in the interior of the hotel, carving the living rock with the most elementary instruments.

The main entrance has been completed, and serves temporarily as a store-house for the builder's harvests.

A room in the hotel, with its furniture one with the wall and floor—all carved from the soft native stone.