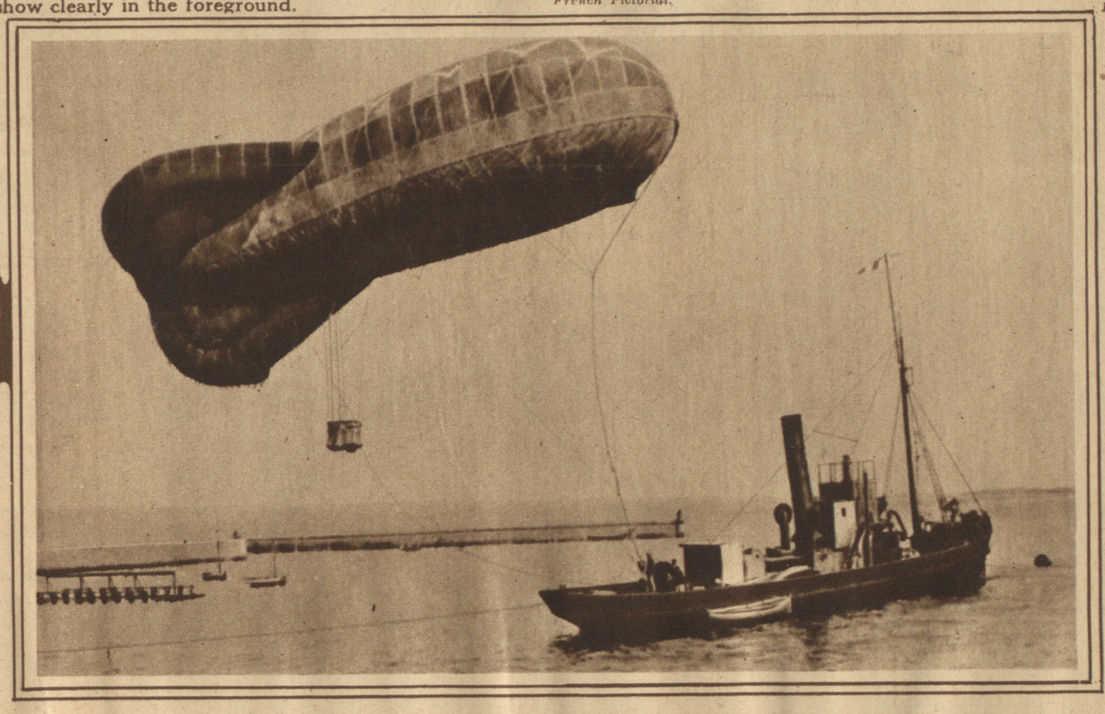
Here's a remarkable picture taken from a French seaplane acting as scout for the destroyer in the foreground and its convoy, a munitions ship. From above, the seaplane can detect a submarine at great depth, and immediately signals the spot to the destroyer, when both combine in an attack. Parts of the seaplane, from which the photograph was made, show clearly in the foreground.
French Pictorial.

A zero weather outfit for a U. S. sailor. Of specially woven wind-proof cloth, with a helmet and cowl of same material, and cloth-lined heavy boots, it should serve to keep out some of Winter's heavy blasts.
Paul Thompson.



This French sausage balloon signals the approach of enemy vessels to the forts ashore. The tug acts as convoy towing it from place to place along the coast.
Underwood.

A wonderful and rare photograph of a night attack on the Western front. Hand grenades, bursting shells, and bombs turn the darkness into an inferno of noise and light through which the troops advance to the attack.
Underwood.

Scene in the Tunnel Trenches near Dixmude. Supplies for the guns of the Belgian troops along the firing line are carried up on this carefully protected well-hidden tramway.
Kadel & Herbert.

King George of England, inspecting a British cavalry camp, watches with great interest a horse being fitted with a gas mask.
Central News.