The Allies' Secondary Defence

Military strategists, in their calculations, should not overlook the hoodoo effect of these British mascots on the German army.

British Official, from Gilliams Service.

Bill will stand for anything—except the acquisition of Mitteleuropa by the Central Powers.

Just a dog, but he may have influence.

Seated on a captured German mortar is Charles Darwin, in the act of hoodooing all German guns of that type.

This veteran landed in Belgium with the Royal Engineers in 1914, and was present at Ypres and Loos. He has been wounded, and is now on leave in Italy.

The Royal Flying Corps has great faith in the ability of its rabbits to show Germany her place.

Even the British officers have their weakness.

The Royal Welsh Fusiliers are training this Angora goat to elope with one now carefully guarded at Potsdam.

The South Africans have brought Nancy all the way from home to show up these Northern-bred mascots.